Erick Laming is a PhD candidate in criminology at the University of Toronto. His research largely focuses on police use of force, police oversight and accountability, and Indigenous and Black community members' experiences with the criminal justice system.

During this session, Erick will offer attendees an objective perspective on the latest body camera research and developments in Canada, focusing on what boards should consider before making a body camera investment.

Erick's dissertation project is funded by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada and his published research has also explored issues concerning police body-worn cameras, Indigenous policing, and police oversight and accountability structures in Canada. Recently, he co-authored a study for the Ontario Human Rights Commission titled, Use of force by the Toronto Police Service: Final Report.
